

Matzenauer's Turn at Recital And Flower Show

By Sylvester Rauling.
MARGARET MATZENAUER gave a song recital at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Well worth hearing it was, too, as the tribute of a great audience, whose applause was discriminating, proved. The flowers handed to her across the footlights did not equal in quantity those that were presented to Marcella Sembrich on the previous afternoon, but they were a plenty, too plentiful indeed for those of us who object to horticultural exhibitions on such occasions.

In some of the advertisements, although not on the official programme, Mme. Matzenauer was announced as "prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company." Why, dear Mme. Matzenauer? Where is the soprano to-day that has a voice of such breadth, and depth, and luscious quality as yours, and whose delivery is so easy and natural and effortless? Sing your Brunnhilde and Isolde, if you will, and Mr. Gatti will let you; but stick to the proper designation of your voice. Essentially it is not soprano, but it holds warmth and color that any soprano well may envy.

Mme. Matzenauer's programme began with an Italian group by Scarpatti, the "Ninna Nanna" exquisitely sung. Then she fell into German songs that included Richard Strauss's "Seitdem Dein Aug in Meines schaute" and Erich Wolf's "Alle Dinge haben Sprache," finely expressed. After that came a French group, in which she had to repeat Debussy's "La Choeur." At the end, in English (perfect English, too, as Mme. Matzenauer's declaimed the text), were Frank La Forge's "Hesperus the Crucifix" and "When Your Dear Hands," and Cyril Scott's "Lullaby" and "Blackbird's Song," which she had to repeat, was full of imagination and spiritual ecstasy. There was clamorous demand for more, to which Mme. Matzenauer yielded. Her singing of the big aria from "Samson and Delilah" was most effective. Only a plea for catching a train to Chicago served to send the greedy ones home. Pie, pie, Mme. Matzenauer! Such a shortness to your skirts, and you anything but what the English call a "rapper!"

Gulomar Novae, the young Brazilian pianist, gave a recital at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon that interested the mature musicians and fairly carried a large audience off its feet. Her talent is linked with stupidity. The stinging tone that she evokes is as personal as her interpretations. The unity that she preserved in the Chopin sonata was remarkable, although, perhaps, she took the opening of the funeral march a trifle too fast. She began her programme with Cesar Franck's prelude, choral and fugue. At the end she presented four lighter compositions by Saint-Saens, Stojowski and Philipp, in which she displayed variety of touch, brilliancy, delicacy and noble charm. Not a few persons this time, but three-fourths of the audience, crowded to the front and clamored for more from the tired girl and got it. How long before we shall establish a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Artists?

Francis Rogers, the popular baritone, accompanied by Isidore Luckstone at the piano, gave a recital at the Comedy Theatre yesterday afternoon. The intimacy of the little house gave Mr. Rogers opportunity to display his grace and delicacy of voice and interpretation at their best. His programme ran from Bach to a Kentucky folk-song, "The Nightingale," and it included Mr. Luckstone's "Come Home, Beloved," composed to a Japanese lyric by Yone Noguchi.

Not Bizet's "The Pearl Fishers," but Puccini's "Manon Lescaut," was presented at the Metropolitan Opera House last night to the disappointment of an audience that crowded the house to hear the old but, to us, new opera. However, Caruso sang and, for most people, that was sufficient. The great tenor sang, too, at his best, which he is doing consistently this season. With the exception of De Luca, instead of Scotti, as Lescaut, the cast was the same as last week. Frances Alda, who had sung in "Prisoners of War" in Philadelphia the night before, again was Manon. Mme. Alda, like Mme. Matzenauer last year, is carrying the burden of heroines so far. Mr. Tappi conducted. The performance was lacking in snap and sparkle.
